

The Yorkshire Philosophical Society

was formed in 1822, when “natural philosopher” was the term used for a scientist and, although the meaning of the word has changed in modern times, our traditional name has been retained.

From its earliest days the Society’s main interests have been the natural sciences and antiquities, and one of its first achievements was to set up the Yorkshire Museum and its Botanical Gardens to promote the study of these subjects. Although the Museum and Gardens were put into Trusteeship in 1961, the Society maintains a close interest in them. Our office is situated in the former gatekeeper’s lodge at the entrance to the Gardens, many of our lectures are held in the Tempest Anderson Hall, and members receive free admission to the Museum.

Today the YPS is a registered charity. We continue to encourage interest in science and archaeology through our annual series of public lectures. This runs from September to June, covering a wide variety of topics from the fields of science, archaeology, history and social sciences, and includes occasional lectures aimed specifically at a family audience, while our regular Café Scientifique sessions give researchers the opportunity to present their work in an informal setting.

The Society is an ally of the British Science Association.

Membership

YPS welcomes everyone to share its interests and participate in its educational and social activities.

In addition to our wide-ranging annual lecture programme (around 20 lectures from September to June), there are special events for members which take place throughout the year including:

- Full and half-day excursions to places of interest in Yorkshire and beyond
- Behind the Scenes visits to York museums, the Universities and other venues
- Informal social events
- Annual Dinner
- Holiday/study tours in the UK or overseas
- Geology field days

Other benefits for members include:

- Free entry to the Yorkshire Museum
- The YPS Annual Report, which includes articles of historic and scientific interest. (These Reports have been published from 1823 to the present.)
- Our quarterly newsletter
- The opportunity to purchase YPS publications at reduced cost
- Use of the Reading Room at the Lodge
- Low-cost photocopying at the Lodge
